While I enjoyed the energy and optimism of the session, I would like to have heard some tangible and specific strategies for making my course more accessible.

Informative and entertaining. Nice to have a presenter who's not reading the slides and the audience isn't suffering death by powerpoint. Thanks!

Too showy. Without all the "gags" his presentation would have been significantly shorter and more focused on the topic.

He is a talented and informative speaker who I am pleased to have had the honor of learning from!

I felt like he was trying very hard to make his presentation sound like a TED talk. Which is fine..but it felt a little try hard. Thomas was also in one of my morning sessions and interjected during the presentation multiple times to promote his book, which was off-putting.

I enjoyed how he wove in Star Wars to teaching online. It wasn't just another boring presentation spouting numbers.

Fantastic speaker! The ideas presented were simple and will be easy to implement. This says a lot considering UD for learning is an overwhelming thought for many online faculty.

It was not anything I had not already heard.

Prof. Tobin was very entertaining, but I also learned a lot. Even though I don't currently teach an online course, there are things I will implement in my live course and generally in my interactions with students.

Great presentation and clearly approached the topic in a meaningful and useful way.

Very compelling presentation on how to teach for the benefit of all.

I didn't glean anything new from it.

It was funny and informative.

Great presentation and keynote speaker!

It was engaging and I am motivated to emulate his lecturing style.

Thomas Tobin's keynote wasn't just relevant to a conference for IU Online; it was relevant for me as a human interacting with others.

Very fascinating look at why accessibility improves education for all learners.

I was not the target audience for his presentation. I've been actively designing accessible materials (and teaching others how to do so) since 2010. I was hoping for more useful information from his presentation.
